Punitive Damages Insurance

Protecting your company against million dollar damages

We've all seen the headlines about immense punitive damages. Entire legal thrillers have been written around a protagonist bringing down a corporation that had to pay out millions, or even billions, in punitive damages. It might be the stuff of fiction and nightmares, but punitive damages – particularly in the U.S. – can be enormous and damaging to a corporation. For example, Novartis was ordered to pay $250 million in a gender bias lawsuit and Shell had to pay $50 million for undisclosed material information. Lawsuits can be very expensive – not just because of legal fees and lawyers, but also because of awards for compensation. And if punitive damages are awarded in addition, the costs can skyrocket.

In this increasingly litigious world every business – large or small – needs insurance to protect them from the large costs associated with lawsuits. While you hope it will never happen to you, there is a real danger that something might go wrong. If it did, and you and your company were taken to court over gross negligence, could your company survive the financial hit incurred by punitive damages? What of the reputational and emotional costs?

The reason punitive damages are often so high is that unlike compensation given in civil suits, they are intended to punish the defendant as well as to deter others from similar conduct. Punitive damages aren't awarded in every case and some U.S. states have strict rules and limitations on when punitive damages will be allowed. In Canada punitive damages tend to be lower, but there are still million dollar payouts which have been upheld in the Supreme Court.

Choosing insurance to cover punitive damages is not always simple. From a risk management perspective there are some key areas to consider. The first is that punitive damages vary from one jurisdiction to another. Also, lawsuits can originate in any jurisdiction. And probably more importantly, most insurance policies do not address the issue of punitive damages directly. Equally, if your policy doesn't specifically exclude punitive damages, it doesn't actually mean you are covered. And if a casualty policy refers to compensatory damages, punitive would not be covered unless by endorsement.

Unfortunately many courts now disallow indemnity payments from an insurance policy for punitive damages. Since the intent of the damages is to punish a defendant, letting an insurance company cover the costs of the damages allows the company to escape punishment for negligence.
